BROKEN

Access resources:

If our old systems are broken, what should we build in their place?

BROKEN is an exploration of how the world could be different if we imagined new ways of being. What does putting nature first look like? What will be important in 60,000 years?

Explore alternate worlds and imagine different ways of shaping a better future.

Kuri Kurru [Turning Circle]

In this interactive seasonal story, Story Teller and Artist Karl 'Winda' Telfer from the Mulla Wirra Meyunna – the Dry Forest people, will take you on a journey in preparation for the Kaurna Meyunna seasons.

What if we put nature first?

The spaces we live in are designed to put our needs first, but what if we were not the priority?

Would we see a flow of benefits from a new system placing nature first?

What if we all stuck together?

With so many big problems in the world to solve, it is no wonder getting started on a solution can seem daunting. People want to see results, now.

But the truth is, we might not ever see the results of our own efforts. Does that mean we shouldn't work together to solve problems?

This exhibit is an experiment in collaboration. Take a sticker and lay it where you choose. Can you work together, even if you might not see what this gallery space will look like at the end?

What if no one owned a home?

Going once, going twice,
SOLD to profit over people!

Social inequity manifests in our current housing system. Homes become less about where the heart is and more about investment and 'land as resource'.

Could there be a new way of life where every person is guaranteed a home?

What if we all had a say?

We sometimes forget that it's not all about us.

Humans make up a fraction of life on Earth yet our decisions impact everything. And these decisions don't just affect the present, they also affect future generations.

Can we make democracy more representative? How do we better include non-human animals and even plants? And how can we better care for people who don't yet exist?

What if learning meant more?

Some people wear it on their sleeve, some bury it deep inside. However you carry it, it is there. That thing. That thing you care deeply about. It feeds your soul, and you nurture it in turn.

How can you start to create a better future with what you care about at the centre? Are you learning how to identify and solve problems to enact change, or is your education missing a heartbeat?

What if we could see the future now?

The future isn't all bad. People are already creating change and here's proof.

From housing and universal services, to democracy and collaboration, to nature and learning, system change is happening right now. Change happens when we imagine new ways of being, set goals to see this change through, and have agency to act on what's important.

There are many pathways to the future. Which one will you choose?

We hope you have fun exploring our museum!
